Washington, D. C., May 26 .- The ways and means committee of the house today had to consider seriously the question of a horse that died in Texas. Nothing less than the Payne-Aldrich law forced the committee to go into the question, although the merits of this much disussed measure were in no way in rolved.

Mormon colonists in Mexico imported a blooded horse for show purposes a the El Paso fair and gave bond to the federal government for the animal's re turn to Mexico within a year, in order to avoid paying tariff duties as imposed by the law. "No," repeated the judge, shaking his head, "there's something strange in the whole affair. I don't believe Howard had any hand in it."

"But he confessed!" exclaimed

The judge shook his head. "That's nothing," he said. "There have been many instances of untrue confessions. A famous affair of the kind was the Boorn case in Vermont. Two brothers confessed having killed their brother-in-law and described how they destroyed the body, yet some time afterward the murdered man turned up alive and well. The object of the confession, of course, was to turn the verdict from murder to manslaughter, the circumstantial evidence against them having been so strong. In the days of witchcraft the unfortunate women accused of being witches were often urged by relatives to confess as being the only way of escape open to them. Ann Foster, at Salem, in 1692, confessed that she was a witch. She said the devil appeared to her in the shape of a bird, and that she attended a meet-
